Frequently asked questions

What is a long stay maintenance patient?

A long stay maintenance patient is a patient who:

- has been in one or more hospitals for more than 35 days
- no longer needs active hospital treatment (acute care)
- still requires a certain level of care
- may be awaiting:
 - placement elsewhere
 - home modifications for a safe discharge
 - home services to be arranged or begin.

How do I know if I am a long stay maintenance patient?

Your doctor will assess your treatment plan and requirements and decide if you are to be classified as a 'long stay maintenance' patient or remain on an 'acute care certificate'. An acute care certificate means that you still need active hospital treatment. If you no longer need active hospital treatment it means that you are a long stay maintenance patient. Your doctor will tell you if this happens.

What happens if I was in another hospital before I came here?

If you have been in any Australian hospital (public, private or both) for 35 days without being discharged during that time for seven or more days, you could be classified as a long stay maintenance patient.

Why am I still in hospital if I don't need active hospital treatment?

You may need to stay in hospital for several reasons. Some people need to wait until their home is modified to make sure they can go home safely. Some are waiting for home services to be arranged or commenced. Others are waiting to go to an aged care facility.

If you have any questions about why you are still in hospital, ask your doctor.

What happens if my condition changes?

If your health condition changes, your status may change back to being 'acute'.

You will not be charged any fees while you are classified as 'acute', even if you have stayed more than 35 days.

However, as soon as the 'acute' period ceases, you will again be classified as a long stay maintenance patient. Your doctor will let you know each time your classification changes.

Will private health insurance cover my expenses?

You may be able use your private health insurance to cover the cost of your long stay maintenance fees, depending on your level of cover.

Advise the ward receptionist that you would like to speak with the patient option liaison officer in order to make an informed choice.

Fees and charges

As a long stay maintenance patient, you are required to pay a daily contribution towards your hospital stay, under section G2 of the National Health Reform Agreement.

All medical, nursing and clinical services will continue to be provided free of charge and you will continue to receive the same care and attention. The fees only apply for the cost of maintenance services such as catering and hospital laundry. The rate of contribution is set nationally and you can find this information on the internet at the Queensland Health fees and charges register:
